Association between an increase in homocysteine and cardiovascular disease in a perimenopausal population. The aim of the study was to investigate the role of homocysteine as a cardiovascular disease risk factor in a population of perimenopausal women. Eighty-six perimenopausal women were consecutively included in the study. Serum samples were taken for analysis of total homocysteine, folate, vitamin B(12), glucose and lipid profile, and the women were questioned regarding their medical history. Eighty-eight age-matched controls were included in the study. Statistical analysis was performed using a t-test, chi(2) and a multivariate logistic regression analysis. In the perimenopausal group, total homocysteine was found to be significantly higher than in controls ( $p = 0.001$ ). Logistic regression analysis revealed that in the univariate analysis the only significant factor that influenced homocysteine was the presence of cardiovascular disease. In the multivariate analysis, homocysteine was determined to be a significant, independent cardiovascular disease risk factor. In the control group, neither serum homocysteine, vitamin B(12), glucose, nor lipid profile was significantly different from the perimenopausal group. It seems that serum homocysteine is related to the presence of cardiovascular disease in perimenopausal women.

A new method for the titration of I- and Ia-antibodies by means of a radial immunodiffusion technique. A new method for the determination of I- and Ia-antibodies of the IgG and IgM classes in the serum is described. It can be applied in a radial immunodiffusion technique after conversion of the antibody molecules to antiglobulin-antibody complexes. After sample preincubation (to dissolve hemolyzed red cells
