public abstract class A { void foo(){ System.out.println("I am in abstract class"); } void bar(){ System.out.println("I am in abstract class"); } static void foobar(){ System.out.println("I am in static class"); } void abc(){ System.out.println("I am in abstract class"); } } abstract class B extends A { void foobar() { foo(); } static void abc() { A.foo(); } } class test extends B{ public static void main(String[] args) { B.abc(); } } OUTPUT: I am in abstract class I am in abstract class I am in static class I am expecting static method should have superclass and non-static method should have superclass but output is showing static method will always have superclass and non-static method will have superclass but i am getting both are having superclass. What is the reason behind this. I want to know if superclass is mandatory to invoke method of superclass. A: A static method does not have a this reference, so it always refers to the class itself.
